Recently a user named billy posted this question: How does the universe come into existence? as suggested by a comment. I do not know the answers, and have no means of finding out. Therefore this is a bad question. Therefore it should be closed. What is the logic behind posing this sort of question, rather than some other question that is similar but more appropriate to physics? A: The question as posed: How does the universe come into existence? I think that is a valid question within the scope of SE: Physics. Not physics as applied to the Universe but the Universe itself. Science can address the fundamental question: why are things the way they are. To ask why does a universe exist (or any universe) is a different question. For example the question Why is There Something Rather Than Nothing at the beginning of time? was recently posed on SE: Philosophy. Once we have an answer for this question it might be a useful tool within the realm of physics. (Better than sticking a rusty nail to the head, but it would be a nail with a potential use.) But at the moment the answer is meaningless without an answer to the other question. In the case of billy, I am not sure what his concern is. But if the universe has no purpose is just exists then it would be a question within the domain of Physics. A: Why does everything exist? Because the universe doesn't care why the things exist. The Universe care is about energy and entropy. The laws of Physics aren't about caring about why things exist, but about their behavior. A: This question is because we, the creatures that have asked the question, exist. So ask us and we will explain. We are not about this question. Our beings provide survival value by explaining our questions to you. You ask, "why are there things??" We
