The Council on American-Islamic Relations, a Muslim civil-rights group, says there are still 300,000 or more Muslim Americans who have not yet been added to the U.S. government's "no-fly" list, which is intended to keep out terrorists. So CAIR is launching a new effort to help them find out whether they are on the list, and if so, to get a court order temporarily barring U.S. airlines from docking them in America. The group's new website, TakeAction.org, wants to send what's known as a "courtesy notice"—an email-like message to Muslims and their family members, CAIR says. The purpose is to warn them that the group will be providing this information for free, and also to let them know that they can avoid being on the list by getting their names removed from government watch lists. Cory Withers, a CAIR spokesman, says the notice will be mailed out on May 10. That's when U.S. airports shut down for the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr. But Withers says his group's objective is to get rid of the no-fly list entirely. "We want to make sure we have nothing on our books, and that there is no longer a watch list," he says. For now, CAIR says it's going to file a court petition to demand that all the Muslims who are not on the no-fly list be added to it, so that they can't get caught up in the "oversight process" any more than they are. CAIR says it has a simple "form letter" it wants the White House to send to the 900,000 Muslim Americans who are still being processed. The letter would be part of a "process" that would take six to eight weeks, CAIR says. It would also ask Muslim Americans who are 2d92ce491b
